

Cat Social Behaviour

Cat Social Behaviour

SHARE

- Facebook \(opens in new window\)
- Twitter \(opens in new window\)
- Pinterest \(opens in new window\)
- Download \(opens in new window\)
- <?xml version="1.0" encoding="UTF-8"?> Email \(opens in new window\)
- Print \(opens in same window\)

Many people think that cats are haughty and aloof creatures who prefer solitude. However, this is not always true. Some felines may prefer to stay alone but there are many who seek out groups and human contact. The genes of the father often determine cat social behaviour. So, whether they grow up to be bold or timid, friendly or aggressive can, thus, be hereditary. However, if our furry friends receive human attention and handling when they are 2 to 7 weeks old, they may grow up to be more friendly, affectionate, and less aggressive.

While felines may not be as effusive as dogs, they have their own unique ways of exhibiting affection. For example, if you are wondering, why my cat keeps meowing and rubbing against everything? It is a friendly gesture. A cat licking hands, curling up against you, and purring at you also shows that you are dear to them and they need your attention.

Here are some tips on how to socialise with feline furries.

Why and How to Socialise with a Cat?

If you are a cat parent, you won't want your furry little munchkin to fight with other animals or be aggressive towards other people, especially children. You need to train your fur babies at the kitten stage to avoid such unnecessary aggression. Kittens are very impressionable and the social inputs they receive determine their personality. If you introduce your kitten to other animals or children or have frequent visitors who shower the kitty with affection, they will grow up friendly. If they do not meet other people or animals like kittens, they will be wary of strangers as they grow up.

One easy way to ensure that your furball meets many people and socialises even if you lead a solitary life is to take them out for walks, frequent grooming sessions, or regular check-ups at the vet's clinic. This shall mean that your kitty meets other people and animals and interacts with them very early in their lifespan. Thus, you provide them with opportunities for happy, stress-free socialisation. They get used to playing with others and being touched, thereby growing into a friendly, playful cat. If you have an aggressive cat, you have to be very patient with them and gently help them to get accustomed to people and other animals on their own terms.

Socialisation with Shy Cat

A shy cat will flee, hide, or cower upon meeting strangers or other animals. The best way to socialise with them is to help them feel safe and secure. You can do the following

- Create spaces where they can hide easily so as to reduce their anxiety
- Follow a regular socialising routine with your kitty
- Ensure that your fur baby isn't being bullied by other animals
- Sit quietly in your kitty's presence so that they get used to you and approach you. You may give them a treat while you read or listen to calming music so that they associate you with a happy experience.

Taking these steps will help your shy cat become friendlier and more confident. You may then socialise with them by playing using small toys, or rewarding them with treats when they approach you, building up to where they will get used to you stroking and petting them.

Socialisation with Playful Cat

Cats like to play and a friendly, playful cat is a cat parent's dream until they get the zoomies and start running around at full speed, toppling things over, or start playful fighting with resident pets that soon turns into a full-fledged feud! If you have such a playful little munchkin at home, you may follow these steps to socialise with them.

- Use their playtime effectively to ensure energy release. Involve them in high-energy but structured games and/or activities.
- Take them outdoors but ensure they aren't being bullied by other animals or children.
- If your kitty is being hyper-energetic and playful only for a burst of a few minutes, simply allow the behaviour until they burn out. Not everything needs to be remedied.
- If they continue to remain hyperactive or stressed over long periods of time, consult your vet and check for hyperthyroidism which may often trigger such restless behaviour.

Socialise with Scared Cat

If your kitty is particularly timid or scared, it may be hereditary or it may be a sign of some bad experience or trauma in the past. These furballs require extra love, care, and attention. Here are some ways in which you can help your scared little feline friend.

- You have to be extremely patient with a scared feline. You have to be gentle and kind, and let them approach you in their own time. Do not do anything that might startle them. Always keep their needs in mind before you plan an activity.

- You may regulate cat social behaviour by creating a routine around them so that your kitty knows what to expect from their day and when they might be visited by you or others you want them to socialise with.
- You may also create hiding spaces for them around the house so they have safe spaces to go to when they feel anxious.

Socialisation with Aggressive Cat

First, you have to understand what is causing such aggressive behaviour in your feline friend. Some triggers may be temporary and manageable while others may be a bit trickier. Here are some tips on how to socialise with an aggressive cat.

- Prevent games where your munchkin is allowed to bite you, claw at you or fight with you, even if it seems harmless at first. They may bite or claw at a stuffed toy instead. A cat licking hands is fine. Biting or clawing should be prevented. A rubbing cat means that the cat may be in heat or may be marking their territory.
- If you bring in a new pet or if the kitty is a new member and you already have another pet, keep the feeding, sleeping, and litter zones separate in the beginning until they get used to each other.
- Ignoring is often a better way to deal with aggressive behaviour than meting out punishment.
- Avoid over grooming in cats and seek veterinary advice if aggressive cat behaviour persists.

Other Tips to Socialise with Cats

- To make your cat social, use a calm voice around your furry babies and be composed and regular in your actions. Loud, startling sounds or actions may create a stressful environment for your little furry munchkin.
- If you are lifting your kitty, make them feel secure by placing your palm under its chest and lifting them gently. They should not feel stressed or tense as you lift them.
- As you begin stroking your fur baby, remember that they too are just getting used to you and may have their own boundaries. Stroke their heads and backs gently and stroke their bellies later as they become more at ease in your company. They will actually let you know when you can pet them on their belly. Cat purring while lying close to you on their back and exposing their belly is usually a very good indicator of this!
- When you first bring home your furry baby, and especially if they are small, bend down to their level or stay as close to the ground as possible for the first few weeks so that they don't feel anxious about you towering like a giant over them! This helps reduce a lot of stress and anxiety in kittens.

FAQ on Cat Social Behaviour

All Questions

Filter by

- All Questions

1. How do I know if my cat is allergic to its food?

Food allergy in cats is a common occurrence caused by an allergic reaction to certain food proteins. Cats suffering from common cat food allergies can show signs such as itchiness, skin inflammations, and stomach disorders like diarrhoea and vomiting.

2. Do cats sense the emotion in humans?

Cats are pretty sensitive to humans and can read specific emotional signals in their humans. However, the sensitivity of a cat is lesser than that of a dog. Even on understanding human emotions, cats show subtle and slight changes in behaviour.

3. Do cats recognise their owner's voice?

Yes, after lots of research, it has been deciphered that cats can recognise their owner's voice. They can distinguish it from the voice of a stranger. This is why your kitty comes running to you when you call its name.

4. How can I understand my cat?

Understanding your cat is easy. Take close note of its behaviour and body language. Notice its eyes, ears, furs, its calls and meows, and its tail. You will have a clear idea of what your cat is trying to convey.

5. How do you tell your cat you love them?

There are many ways to tell your furry little munchkin that you love them, such as:

- Let it rub against you
- Pet it gently
- Mimic its voice
- Slow blinking and gazing into its eyes lovingly
- Groom it
- Play with it

6. How do I stop my Cat from being Aggressive towards Strangers?

Remember that aggression may stem from traumatic experiences of the past. Be extremely kind and gentle towards your fur baby and ensure positive experiences with strangers to mitigate the effects of poor past experiences. Avoid over grooming in cats and consult a vet for expert advice.

7. How do I make my Cat not Scared of People?

You have to be patient with your kitty. Create hiding spaces where they can retreat when they feel stressed. Allow them to approach people rather than the other way around. Encourage positive experiences with other people through treat rewards.

8. How do I Socialise my Cat with Strangers?

Be patient with your furry little munchkin and give them the freedom to approach strangers on their own terms. Never push it! Always ensure gentle and positive experiences with strangers to ensure comfortable and easy cat social behaviour.

9. How do I get my Cat to Socialise More?

Getting kittens socialised is a very good start. You may also try to take cats out for walks, to the park, to grooming sessions, or to regular vet check-ups where they can meet other animals and humans in order to make a cat social.

SEE ALL

See More Articles Like This

Cats Getting Old

When your cat reaches the age of seven, you probably won't notice much different about the way she behaves. After all, most cats live until they're 13-17. Besides, your cat's probably still active, healthy, and just as independent and curious as ever!

READ MORE

Coping with the Loss of Pet Cat

Like most cat-owners, you probably see your feline friend as a member of your family. So, when she finally passes away, you'll experience a very real sense of grief. Allow yourself to feel this pain, which is absolutely normal, but also remember that time is a great healer. Letting yourself say goodbye to your cat is being put to sleep by your vet, you will probably be able to stay with her throughout the procedure. For some people, it's important to be able to say goodbye to their pet in this way. But even if you can't be in the room, you'll be able to spend some time with her first, and say your final goodbyes afterwards. Allowing yourself to grieve After your cat has passed away, you'll probably feel a variety of emotions. These might include shock, disbelief, pain, anger, guilt, depression and anxiety. Don't suppress any of these feelings - they're quite natural. Going through this grieving process will help you to come to terms with the death. In time, previously painful memories will remind you of your cat in a positive light, and you'll find yourself smiling instead of crying. Help and support Everyone grieves differently. You might prefer to grieve alone, perhaps writing down your feelings and thoughts in a diary, or in poetry. You might look to your family and friends for support. Or you might feel more comfortable talking to strangers, in which case your vet will be able to tell you about local support groups. Most important of all, never feel embarrassed about grieving over “just a cat” - the emotions you’re feeling are real, and you need to deal with them in whatever way suits you best.

Helping your children deal with death Most children under the age of five don't understand the concept of death. They may understand that death isn't very nice, but they won't really understand that your cat won't be coming back. Even so, they may be deeply distressed by the fact that their furry friend just isn't around any more. So make sure you give them lots of love and support. Between the ages of five and nine, children become aware that death is final. They may even believe in an afterlife. Let them talk about what's happened, and never dismiss your children as being “too young to understand”. Older children will fully understand the concepts of death and grief. So they'll experience the same range of emotions as adults following the death of your cat. Grieving children can occasionally develop behaviour problems, such as becoming clingy, wetting the bed, having nightmares or being unable to concentrate in school. You can help by talking to your children about how they feel, and by being honest about what's happened. If it's necessary to have your cat put to sleep, include them in that decision-making process, so that their feelings are acknowledged early on. And while as an adult you're probably more comfortable with the phrase “putting to sleep”, make sure you tell your children that your cat is going to die. While it may seem harsh, it's more important that they understand exactly what's going on.

Cat memorials You may not have considered what you want to do with your pet's body. It's a good idea to talk this through with your family and vet while she's still alive. There are four basic options - your vet will be able to advise you on all of them: Burial at home Burial in a pet cemetery Individual cremation - your pet's ashes are returned to you Communal cremation Your decision might be guided by all sorts of things - emotional, financial and practical. If you choose burial at home, contact your local council first to find out about any guidelines you should follow. And whatever you decide, make sure that everyone who was close to your cat is comfortable with the plan.

READ MORE

Cat behaviour: Understand Your Cat's Body Language & Emotion

Cats make one of the best family pets. But before you bring a feline furry friend home, make sure that you have a fair understanding of their body language and behaviour as this will help in better communication with your fur baby when they become a part of your family.

READ MORE

Reducing Aggressive Kitten Behavior

In the wild, big cats will naturally respond to threats by acting aggressively. Your kitten is no different. However, you might find your kitten acts aggressively even when there's no reason for her to feel threatened - during playtime, for example.

READ MORE

Source URL:

<https://www.whiskas.me/care/1-plus-years-old-cats/facts-about-cats/cats-social-behavior>